Homo economicus, in simple terms, is an individual with interests and preferences and a rational capacity oriented to maximizing those preferences, which are usually considered as self-regarding. This model has its immediate source in John Stuart Mill, with antecedents in certain nineteenth-century economists, ultimately traceable to Adam Smith, who had a broader view of the human being.

The Homo Economicus Model | SpringerLink

Homo Economicus is a hypothetical concept that humans are: Self-interested. Know what they want. Make rational choices to maximise their utility. These choices are based on the concept of marginal utility. This concept of a rational economic man is an important cornerstone of neo-classical economic theory. It creates a framework to model how consumers and firms will respond to different situations.
