Basically the nature of learning is complex, and museums can improve learning experiences by considering aspects of personal context (why someone chose to visit and what they're interested in), socio-cultural context (the learning that happens through social and interaction and mediation), and physical context (good design and communication).

HOW LEARNING HAPPENS IN MUSEUMS. Learning in museums is an autonomous experience, with visitors taking an active role in planning, monitoring, controlling and reflecting. We know from decades of research into self-regulated learning that it is important to understand the goals and initial interest people bring to the learning situation. These drive behaviour and learning in different settings, including in museums.
